

Grand entrance

Ron Rittenhouse/The Dominion Post

Workers from Mardo Masonry, of Waynesburg, Pa., remove scaffolding from the new main entrance of the WVU College of Law.

Law school masonry work nearly finished

The Dominion Post

A familiar building has an unfamiliar entrance.

Crews are building the new entryway for the WVU College of Law Building, which is starting to look like the artist renderings. The new entrance is on the side of the building that overlooks the Health Sciences Campus.

Officials have said the new entryway will allow the building to have a distinctive front door, something that was lacking in the previous layout. The masonry work is expected to be finished this week.

The entryway is part of the addition for the building, which also includes new classroom, office and courtroom space. The project also includes renovations to existing parts of the building.

The entire renovation and addition work is expected to

Ron Rittenhouse/The Dominion Post

According to site foreman Robert Brady, the masonry work will be finished this week. The overall entrance job is slated for completion in March.

wrap up in the summer of 2016.

Work on the College of Law Building is just one of several ongoing construction projects on WVU's property including a few projects on the Evansdale Campus.